

A wistful wind blows
the longing cry of a lark echoes Mexican music plays loudly Dishes clang as they are put up to dry
I sit here on this couch and ponder why

Each piece of furniture here has a purpose
The rug to round out the lovely living room
A boom box basked in perfectly beneath a brown desk
An alcove above the kitchen counter creating a separate space

I feel I am losing the race

Lights glow warm on the walls crickets creak in the cool fall air the wooden floor vibrates as the bass booms scents of warm cooking waft through the air

Into the abyss I stare

Familiar thoughts flow the cute carlie bounces with the beat the time comes closer that we'll eat A dog barks beckoning into the night

Light recedes from my brain as I greet the fight

Somewhere not so far sirens sing as emergency services rush cars careen around turns carelessly

People play games or are placated by screens Pets pawl their boxes pent up from being stuck

Some part of me wondering if there's such a thing as luck

Feelings fill out their opinions

Aches voice their struggle, tightening muscles

Memories illustrate their experience, playing pictures

Mentors words wander their way through and so

I sit here on this couch and ponder why
I feel I am losing the race

Into the abyss I stare

Light recedes from my brain as I greet the fight
Some part of me wondering if there's such a thing as luck

You see I'd like to think

Since we'll die, it's probably the case that life goes to those who dare to choose the light.

Unfortunately, my mind runs amuck

Is a better move to surrender in this stage?

Pushing and pressing seems to be all the rage create, connect, conceive ideas What's better? And if I want to go big Must I zig when most zag? In other words college, credible businesses, do I need to join to get the bag?

How is it that those with no degree or credibility end up on top you see?