

The sound of Rain crackles on the metal roof

The light through the glass casting shadows Gods tears rolling down towards the ground

It's not quite cold, so I mustn't waste gas Condensation from the heat of me grows as water flows faster I sit in this cloth chair pondering "Glases of emotion"

The rain is like the energy of life in an oddway
It comes and goes, day or night. it comes with woes and delights it may soothe pain or excite regardless it falls as I write Droplets are opportunities the way life is neverending and infinite in it's options, but with the rain comes less visibility. This kind of blindness a strife that leaves me feeling far from strong I can't see past everything happening now should I slow down?
People will crash, and I must go around, but how do I know if I'm covering enough ground? Too slow and I lose more to fast and I hydroplane. Squinting and speculating about what's ahead is in vain. Hum, here's what I know Storms attract me. a form of power I want to run in to and when I am soaked to the bone and have found my throne near a haven of fire. I'd love to be with a woman who's chosen me and known my heart from the start. So I suppose there is at least one course to chart there. And yet I lack the storm to attack as an art.

Water Galls, breath Gogs the window, I fight
Time to ride I suppose and further cast a net wide.
Take the bluvia in stride, spirit be my guide
